Add the detail, inspiration, and motivation you need, with our regular monthly supplements. Ask HN: How do you determine when to launch? - WorkBig This question isn't relevant to me, but I saw an article yesterday where this gentleman had a really interesting way of determining when he had to launch his product. And just like so many of you, I find myself wondering when I should launch something. More often than not, I never do and eventually learn my lesson. ===== aespinoza I find that most of the times I should launch is when I have a clear benefit, completing a feature on my own product or without paying someone. Usually I find that if you are just paying someone, then maybe you should just keep working on the product for a little bit more. But I know your situation is different. The other point is when you have a clear reward. Imagine, you are working on the product and waiting for someone to pay for it. Are you sure they will? Are you sure it will be useful to their needs? That is what I usually look for. Honestly I always think about it before I start. But once I started it is kind of hard to stop. Usefulness of the automatic segmentation of abdominal cross-sectional images obtained with MRI for tumor volume calculation. We evaluated the usefulness of the automatic segmentation of abdominal MRI images for tumor volume calculation. We studied 33 patients with pancreatic cancer (11 males, 22 females; mean age 62 years; range 43-84 years) who underwent both MRI and computed tomography (CT). First, the images were manually segmented. We examined the segmentation effects with two methods. One method used only MRI and a threshold technique for the liver. The other method used only CT and a threshold technique for the liver. We also examined the reproducibility and intra-observer error of our automatic segmentation method by using the intra-ob
